INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this report is to present a bibliography which will guide policy makers and researchers to literature containing information conducive to understanding how social structures can foster development. This purpose is much broader than the original intention of compiling a bibliography related only to the delivery of services in nonmetropolitan areas.

Recent concern with ecology, social indicators, and the quality of life underscores the point that the private pursuit of economic goals is not necessarily in the public interest. For the purpose of this report, development is defined as a decision-making process characterized by resource utilization which benefits the public interest as well as private economic interests.¹ The simultaneous occurrence of development and economic growth is likely to be a consequence of the efforts of social structures to undertake planned social change, defined as social change which results from a conscious, deliberate, or purposive process directed toward attaining a particular goal.

Unfortunately, many individuals have not yet learned how to work through social structures in order to attempt to affect a particular planned social change. For these individuals and others, associations with groups, organizations, clubs, or other identifiable social structures is not always pleasant or meaningful. Nevertheless, social structures can enable individuals or communities to attain goals which they otherwise could not attain.

The present bibliography includes entries which are related to any of the topical areas listed in the TABLE OF CONTENTS and which were identified in a careful reading of a variety of social science journals published between 1960 and ¹For a discussion of a sociological definition of development, see Wayne H. Oberle, "A Sociological View of 'Development'," a paper presented at the 3rd World Congress of Rural Sociology, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, August 22-27, 1972.

1972.² For the convenience of the reader, whenever an entry had utility for more than one topical area, it was listed in each appropriate section.

Certain topics are not given separate headings, but are found grouped under broader main categories. Thus, the "Community Organization" section (Section E) includes entries on cities, local power structures, local planning, and local programs. The "Poverty, Status Attainment, and Mobility" section (Section I) includes a focus on decision-making. The "Social Indicators" section (Section N) incorporates a concern with the quality of life. The "Social Organization" section (Section O) includes a focus on social problems.

This report contributes to two Texas Agricultural Experiment Station projects: (1) H-1895, "The Contribution of Voluntary Associations to Community Development in Nonmetropolitan Areas of Texas" and (2) H-3148, "Institutional Structures for Improving Rural Community Services." The latter project is contributing to Western Regional Project U-114, "Institutional Structures for Improving Rural Community Services."
